none of them come forward and say a word for the old decencies of which they are supposed to be the guardians?

*   *   *   *

America's action in refusing to ratify the Peace Treaty has apparently given the coup de grace to that unhealthy infant the League of Nations. We have already given our reasons for describing the League as merely a League of Allied Capitalists. We therefore shed no tears over its corpse. The exclusion of Germany, Austria and Russia from the League, and the undemocratic nature of its constitution, were sufficient to condemn the League in the eyes of those who were not deceived by a name. The withdrawal of America will, it is hoped, swell the number of the disabused. The League must now cease to exist or declare itself for what it is. We do not despair of a real and effective League of Nations, though it may not come in our day. Such a League must be conceived, however, not in the spirit of Militarism and Capitalism, but of simple goodwill. It will be possible only among a society of free and equal peoples. Whoever wishes to work for the real League of the future must begin at home. We do well to look forward and imagine the future, but we have to grasp firmly the fact that, until Capitalism is overthrown, plans for the peace of the world are premature, and will only bring disappointment to those who set their hearts on them.

---

THE SLEEPERS.

Having slept so long, men do not wish to wake.
Nor stir, nor understand,
Nor brush the darkness from their brows and take
The grandeur close at hand.
Are songs and cries of weariness that mark
Labour and revelry,
But lonely waters crying in the dark
That flow down to the sea?
Courageous ires, the fruits of iverful claims,
Are folded in a keep.
Of dreams and smoke that once were acts and flames—
For men, poisoned with words and bitter names,
Have cried themselves to sleep.
And in that sleep are dreams of frightful hue:
Drag slow across the brain
Marauding talons of the Golden Few.
The coroneted pirates saunter through;
The load of dreaming breaks the heart in twain,
The sleeper wakes—to find those dreams are true—
And falls asleep again!

FURNLEY MAURICE.
call on his life. If you say that it is what the king stands for—Empire, Christianity, etc., etc.—then we say the claim is, if possible, more remote from truth than ever. You, like the rest of us, were hypnotised, deluded, drugged. Like the mothers of Israel, who thought they were doing a great religious act and appeasing their god, you gave your firstborn—the fruit of your body—for what? A great illusion?

Many a time the thought must have come to you that all was not right—that it was very unfair to require your son, on the threshold of manhood, to fight for commerce—or such vague talk as the nation's integrity—or the independence of small nations—when all the nations engaged had been sooner or later the oppressor. The sacrifice has been in vain, but we need not despair. If the bereaved mothers made the effort, they alone could stop the next war. They alone, if they warned with their eloquent passion their younger sisters or their daughters who had eligible sons of what they had uselessly suffered, then war would be impossible. You could spare them the mental and spiritual agony of seeing their stalwart sons in a few days or hours shattered to pieces to be tossed aside with disgust.

And the men your sons fought for—are they remorseful? Do they grieve? Have they in their anguish cried out, like David, "Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings: for there, the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away"? Do they implore the daughters of Israel "to weep over Saul"? Do they cry, "I am distressed for thee—my brother Jonathan"? Do they exclaim, "How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished"? No. Even if they felt so, their policy restrains them from uttering it. Eleven millions of men slaughtered, many more millions of children and women starved, tens of thousands become insane—and not one thing your sons fought for an accomplished fact! War as a method of reform is useless: as a policy it is entirely inefficient. Bereaved mothers, end war!—Yours, etc.

WARRIGAL.

NOTE.

"Fellowship" was founded, and is still mainly supported, by the Free Religious Fellowship. But, as that society has no dogmas, theological or political, the views expressed in "Fellowship" are in no sense official, and the individual writers are alone responsible for them.

"Fellowship" is supported entirely by voluntary subscriptions, which will be received by Miss M. Agnew, 268 Latrobe Street, Melbourne.

Please notify changes of address.

RUSSIAN BALLET, AND AN OLD COMEDY.

"J'aime Shakespeare." Verlaine said once to Arthur Symons: "Mais j'aime mieux le ballet—I love Shakespeare, but I love the ballet still more!"

With the Russians the ballet is a serious art. Fokine was the first to break away from the 18th century conventions, by introducing a richly romantic story into the ballet. He produced "Schéhérazade" and "Prince Igor" from the music by Rimsky-Korsakov and Borodin, and the still more admirable "Perousska" (music by Stravinsky), with its quaint street scenes and folk dances. Then Nijinski cultivated what has been called a plastique art, the finest example of which is his rendering in ballet form of the Mallarmé Debussy "L'Après Midi d'un Faune." The latest phase is that of Léonide Massine, who, especially in his latest work, "The Three-Cornered Hat," reveals himself as a lover of actuality, an uncompromising realist.

A most original work is this ballet of Spanish peasant life; it is not the Spain of the conventional theatre, but the true Spain studied on the spot. What passes in the theatres for Spanish dancing is an artificial product, with little connection with art or nature.

Massine spent two years making studies, in the little-frequented places of Spain, and in the cafés of the people themselves. Spanish dancers are born, not trained, with a perfect sense both of technique and rhythm.

In an interview, Massine said that the greatest change in the future will be the emancipation from the classical school, which has held the field for centuries, for, despite its great achievements, it is none the less a heavy burden. "In the classical school," he said, "there are laws governing every action. If, for example, a man wants to express his love, he is taught to put his hand to his heart and to look enraptured; and if he wishes to kill you, he must take three steps forward in a determined way, and raise one of his arms in the attitude of striking a blow. These and all similar gestures are really missing. To me they seem just as false as art as if everyone were taught to say the same phrases in precisely the same manner." Yet, the ballet is a dance; and Massine, a great dancer himself, never employs the usual means of imitative gesture taken from ordinary life, but always seeks to create his new efforts by purely choreographic gesture.

No wonder the old-fashioned critics were shocked. Instead of the sentiment and picturesque associations with the Spaniards, the theatrical costumes, the emotions, the atmosphere of the dance, the chances were not the Andalusian measures of a young maiden's fancy. They were rough, harsh, foolish in the movement, but always full of rhythm. The whole body danced, as in true Spanish dancing, and every movement had meaning, character. The story of the miller and his wife is broad farce; but you felt the hot atmosphere of the country village, for the dances were truly expressive, coming straight out of life.