Menzies’ Treason Act Drags Country Back To Dark Ages

By proposing to introduce the first Commonwealth treason act the Menzies-Fadden Government is attempting a drag Australia back to the 14th century.

It is trying to put the clock back to the reign of Edward III, the age of the Black Death and Statute of Laborers, which jacked workers who asked for more pay.

In the 50 years since its foundation the Commonwealth has never had a treason act, the closest approach to one being the Commonwealth Crimes Act, condemned by all sections of the labor and democratic parties, as a means of controlling who can vote and who cannot vote, and who can sit in Parliament.

The Commonwealth, however, has been failed. It has been failed by the Commonwealth’s failure to pass a law to control the voting public, and to prevent its being controlled by the voting public.

The Commonwealth’s failure has been due to the Commonwealth’s failure to pass a law to control the voting public, and to prevent its being controlled by the voting public.

New Threat Hastens Plans For Deputation

Fresh news of Menzies’ intended assassination of Australian civil liberties has given new impetus to plans for the Canberra deputation of April 4.

NUMBER of delegates elected at union, job and factory, civic, park and hall meetings around the country will be seen to be effective in the prevention of policy, and the control of the Canberra deputation.
