Carr comments that the party has not yet determined the strategy and tactics to be followed, and he suggests that the party should be more democratic in its decision-making process. He writes: "It is not fierce, iron discipline that makes us strong. It is the traditional spirit inherited from the age of A.E.S., and it is not as efficient and wide-ranging as our old spirit."

Carr's comments suggest that the party should be more open and democratic in its decision-making process, and that the traditional spirit of the past should be retained and updated to fit the new circumstances.

In a class-divided society where the individual has no control over the social and economic system, the individual must struggle to bring about a change in the social order. The party must be the vanguard of the working class and lead the struggle for a socialist society.

In the past, the steelworkers and farmers of the Soviet Union have been the vanguard of the working class. They have been able to lead the struggle for a socialist society because they have been organized and united in the party.

In the future, the party must continue to be the vanguard of the working class and lead the struggle for a socialist society. The party must be strong and united in order to lead the struggle for a socialist society.
