As Free as the Air

Air pollution is among many features of the environment causing great concern to modern man. Is it a universal problem? But is there a difference in the way the capitalist and socialist world would tackle the question? Two Soviet writers, Makar Pivovarov and Tatyana Troitskaya, deal with this matter below. The opening is an excerpted version of their article "As Free as the Air" which appeared in the New Times No. 2, 1972.

A new fry of business has made its debut in the capitalist world when something is sold that can provide leisure in a profit. A new phenomenon, that of pollution and its control, is being born. We are talking about the atmosphere.

Pollutants have been a part of our environment since the beginning of the industrial revolution. But the pollution of the air is now a major concern, not only in capitalist countries, but also in socialist countries.

One atmosphere

But if the question is complicated, so is the answer. The problem is not straightforward, and there are no easy solutions. The pollutants are released into the air in a variety of ways, and their effects are not always apparent immediately. The air we breathe is a mixture of gases, including oxygen, nitrogen, and carbon dioxide, as well as other substances such as pollutants.

Some pollutants are released into the air naturally, such as carbon dioxide from plants and animals, and methane from decomposing organic matter. Other pollutants are man-made, such as sulfur dioxide from factories and power plants, and nitrogen oxides from motor vehicles.

The pollutants can have a range of effects on human health and the environment. Some pollutants, such as sulfur dioxide, can cause respiratory problems and contribute to acid rain. Others, such as nitrogen oxides, can contribute to smog and contribute to climate change.

Palliatives

Yet as in the case of water, there are no palliatives. The problem is complex, and its solution will require a multifaceted approach. The solution will not be easy, and it will require the efforts of all of us.

Condemned

The situation is further complicated by the fact that many of the pollutants are released in large quantities, which makes it difficult to control them. The pollutants are also spread over a wide area, which makes it difficult to pinpoint their source.

The solution will require a combination of strategies, including technological advancements, public awareness campaigns, and government regulations. It will also require the participation of all sections of society, from individuals to governments.
